The case has many ramifications. Kaufmann was for a long time considered one of the most trustworthy business men of New York. His partner, M. A. Isaacs, had such implicit confidence in Kaufmann's integrity that, according to Hill, he induced a number of his friends to take shares in the business. One of these was named Hlumm a Cincinnati merchant who put in $27,000. Others invested smaller sums.

The business proceeded satisfactorily for six months, until Blumm asked a customer to settle an outstanding account, which the customer declared was not due. An investigation of the company's accounts followed, and resulted in the discovery of a number of falsified entries amounting to $107,000. Kaufmann, in the meantime, had disjail with their lives if necessary. The captain of the company said his men had voted not to shoot their fellow townspeople even though commanded to do so, but would protect as best they could without shooting the negroes in the jail. The governor told the captain that his men were in a virtual state of mutiny and would be severely censured for their action. The captain replied he had done the best he dould with his men, but they were firm in their determination not to kill their friends in the little town.
